Speech Recognition Technology

Modern speech recognition software allows humans to communicate directly with computers via the human voice. Speech recognition is based on mathematical calculations that determine statistical relationships between words. These calculations allow machines to predict probabilities that any group of words will appear one after another in speech.

Like many new technologies, the software to recognize speech did not work well at first. Today, however, the most advanced speech-recognition software can convert 160 spoken words into text per minute with an accuracy rate of 95 percent. This is approximately three times faster than most people can type. The accuracy rate can improve to 99 percent if the speaker trains the computer to understand his speech patterns. Speech recognition software can really be useful in many ways. It could help students be more efficient, for example, because they could dictate their papers to the computer instead of typing them.

Several companies now sell versions of speech-recognition software. Carnegie Mellon University has developed one that is free that can be downloaded from the Internet.

It is hard to predict what will happen in the future. The mathematical calculations that make speech-recognition software function today will continue to make this technology better. This may lead to future advances in the areas of artificial intelligence and robotics. Not only will computers be able to transcribe human speech in the future, they may one day understand what we say and engage in conversations.

- A Speech recognition software has made significant advances.
- B Carnegie Mellon has done a lot of work in speech recognition software.

The Importance of Discipline

There is an old saying that “practice makes perfect.” This saying is a useful one and can be applied to almost any situation. It is particularly true for high school students who are about to begin careers in the outside world.

“Why is that?” you may ask. You may know someone who is naturally skilled at a sport or in a particular subject. You may think that being athletic or intelligent is enough. However, this is not always true. If you examine the lives of top performers in any field, you will find that behind their success lies a great deal of hard work and persistence. Those people who are talented—but who don’t practice their skills—generally don’t make it very far.

Many studies have shown that students enter university and find themselves unprepared, and therefore overwhelmed, by the quantity and complexity of the work they are expected to do. If they have taken advantage of their high school years, and have learned to be persistent and hard-working, they will still find the university work hard, but not unmanageable.

Explain what the author is referring to when he says, "However, this is not always true."

Answer: _____
